Case Study

Air New Zealand has hundreds of highly skilled operations experts at airports around the country – from check-in agents to aircraft loaders – but several years ago, when it came to recruiting team management roles from within the business, leadership skills and experience was thin on the ground.

Solution: “We wanted our great operators to also be great team leaders and managers,” says Kate Fitzgerald, Air New Zealand Airport Manager New Plymouth, and Airports Emerging Leaders Project Manager. “We created a trial leadership training programme for operational staff that was such a success we worked with ServiceIQ to link the skills to tangible First Line Management qualifications and rolled it out nationwide.

“We lead our people through two-tiered training starting with team leadership (Level 3) followed by the elite programme (Level 4) for people managing 10-25 employees at airport check-in, loading or cleaning teams.”

Result: Air New Zealand is upskilling 32 operational staff in Level 3 and eight in Level 4 each year. “It’s been huge,” says Kate. “Air New Zealand invests heavily in great leadership development, and this particular programme is very popular with staff because they gain meaningful qualifications and take a step up in their career.

For the company, the training has allowed us to have a real succession plan by creating a pool of skilled and qualified people who will be next in line for high level team management roles.”
